TRANSACTING RURAL COMMUNITY ENGAGEMENT CURRICULUM
March 14th to 20th 2018

Background: Social Work as an academics has ideological, theoretical, method, research, practice and dissemination base. Uniqueness of the social work profession is having based on human rights and social justice. Subsequently, it is to take the course of mobilization, capacity building, skill development and empowerment to achieve social development. Thus being an integral part, the Rural Community Development has a well-defined process of community orientation, community organization, community governance, community engagement, community intervention and community resilience building. Need of the hour is that the social work educators need to be empowered to transact the rural community engagement curriculum through an andragogy approach, which is adult-learning based and contrary to the pedagogy of child-learning. Andragogy realizes the potential of adult learners through creative, critical, participatory and collaborative learning opportunities.

Rural community engagement as a curriculum is offered/practiced in the schools of social work. The content of which is integrated in the syllabus of community organization, community development, rural development papers and rural fieldwork practice at the MSW and BSW course levels. Capacity building of the social work educators through an intensive and rigorous training and workshop model, following participatory and collaborative mode, equips the teachers to transact the rural community engagement content, in a defined scientific and systematic process. Knowledge domain, skills domain, research domain, practice domain and dissemination domain are rightly interwoven in transacting the course. The teachers have this take away to their colleges/universities with an ethical responsibility to train their MSW/BSW students in community engagement and community resilience-building modules both in knowledge and skills domains; then connect to community practice in fieldwork to provide learning opportunity to experience and facilitate community change/development.
