NATIONAL CONFERENCE : CONTEXT :

Neoliberal economy has brought stunning and significant global changes through the free movement of people, technology and business across the geo-political borders of the nations. Global markets were opened to the innovative products, services and technologies. Subsequently, multinationalism and transnationalism emerged in the global corporate economy. Socialistic form of economy gradually converted into corporate capitalism. Giant corporates with major share of accumulated wealth emerged as alternative power and resource-centred organizations, making deep-influence on the political establishment. This phenomenon on the one hand it generated huge wealth owned by a handful of people; on the other hand, it also created social inequalities and economic deprivation across the social categories and gender. Social, economic and environmental impact of the corporate economy is very critical rather than being sustainable. The speed at which the economy is growing is rather detrimental instead of being sustainable. Infrastructure-led economy has been considered as the sole answer and solution to the current pressing problems. This model of development having partial point of view could not achieve holistic and inclusive framework in its development process. Value of wealth is compromised somehow to the human development. State exchequers flown behind the materialistic and quantitative development rather than the qualitative development. Rather to say that economization of human development, social justice, social protection, social welfare and social development remained secondary to the current vibrancy of wealth. This has led to an ideological transition stage of social capitalism, to view the economy in its totality of integrating socialism with capitalism.

As a result of the neoliberal economy, the social transformation has been witnessed in the developing and under-developed societies. India is no exception to this phenomenon. Individual, family, groups, organizations, culture and communities have shown altogether a different pattern. Social change in the behaviour, life style, values, beliefs and practices is drastically observed at varied degrees now, more than ever in any stage of human history. Integrated farm and non-farm economy has emerged due to inadequacies in the rural agricultural system of India.

This economic context of India has contributed for the social and cultural transformation. Families are exposed to intermittent or permanent migration. As a result of which family dynamics is undergoing drastic changes resulting in intergenerational gaps on the one hand, and emerging new challenges in elderly care and protection support system. Both rural and urban communities are encountered with different challenges and responses to meet the elderly care, support and protection needs. Vulnerability, maladjustment, abuse, harassment and abandonment of elderly are the major issues to deliberate and respond. According to WHO, the elderly would account for 22% of the world's population by 2050. Therefore, elderly population is a huge proportion of the general population. Quality of life, empowerment and wellbeing status of elderly has significant impact on the general wellbeing of the society. Changing family and community structure, intergenerational gaps, cultural issues with regard to values, socialization, digital divide and connectivity, active ageing, activity engagement, access to the public services, affordability of services, social security, social capital, life-long education, policy support, and such other issues are of grave concern to understand pragmatically, deliberate critically and respond pro-actively.
